WRITING

Well, I understood this phrase as the meaning of theatre and how Oscar Wilde sees it

So the main thing is that while being in theatre you and a number of people next to you, including the actors, are feeling each other because of the things you see and hear. Those feelings are given ^{to} you by the play and by the actors. Just for example, remember the time when you were in theatre. You watch the show/play and put yourself in it with actors and feel the same feelings and think about what would you do if you were in that place. You think about everything what happens and it can feels like you are experiencing that. Or you can see something that you personally don't understand and try to find out why it happens and what type ^{of} feelings you can have.

In conclusion, I would say that theatre can remind us about the fact that we are all people and we feel. Theatre shows us empathy to all other people and their feelings and surrounding.
